Knights of the Road Roger A. Bruns,1980 In the glory days of hoboing hundreds of thousands of Americans were lured by the wail of soot belching locomotives pulling long lines of freight cars They hit the tracks and beat their way across an America laced with railroad lines Some road in boxcars or crouched in cowcatchers some in empty battery boxes beneath passenger cars others clung precariously to the brake rods inches from stinging cinders The ingenuity of the hobo was only exceeded by his courage and in many cases his desperation Few hobo jungles remain The men and women who sat around campfires swapping yarns sharing stew drinking red eye the working stiffs gay cats yeggs gandy dancers and prushins are a vanishing species But here this fascinating flamboyant chapter of American history lives on Interviews letters songs poetry articles from hobo newspapers IWW literature and autobiographical accounts evoke a colorful often savage portrait of hobo life from the late 1800 s to the Great Depression of lonely days rolling across silent prairies all the sights from the stem of West Madison Street in Chicago to the berry fields of California the spectacle of mangled comrades fallen from trains countless jobs some good many bad times in jail and on chain gangs shivering nights on flophouse floors bloody brawls and hostile towns of excitement adventure and freedom Scoopshovel Scotty Chicken Red Donovan Mountain Dew Boxcar Bertha Steam Train Maury Graham and many others sing their songs and tell their tales Iconoclasts all they defied traditional values bent on staking their own claim to the American ideal of rugged individualism Hardships and humiliations were commonplace but the overwhelming desire to wander freely to be hard travellin drifters kept them always on the move Drawing on personal interviews with veteran hoboes and previously untapped sources including the John J McCook collection and a recently unearthed cache of material in the National Archives Roger Bruns captures the vagabond spirit of these knights of the road and of them days gone forever Jacket flaps
