

Nursing: Working With Aggressive Mentally Ill Patients

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

The problem of working with aggressive mentally ill patients requires an integrated approach and appropriate competencies from nurses. First of all, person-centered care implies the subjective and individual context of conducting medical activities and patient care (American Association of Colleges of Nursing, 2021). It is worth noting that the knowledge accumulated in research tends to a certain degree of universality of approaches, at least within the framework of a specific mental disorder. Competence consists in applying only the necessary accumulated knowledge within each case. Avoidance of aggression is a consequence of building a trusting relationship with the patient, which is the implementation of a pre-prepared plan of care. DNP in this situation may be concerned with evaluating the broader practical implementation of approaches that have been successfully applied within a single study.

Discussion

The second most important competency is the Scholarship for the Nursing Discipline. Since the problem of burnout in the mental health of nurses who experience aggression from patients with mental disorders is still relevant, this area requires additional research (Drukker, 2021). This issue leads to the loss of essential personnel in the early and middle stages of their careers, which, given the shortage of medical personnel caused by the pandemic, leads to highly negative consequences (Ehrlich et al., 2020). Scholarship implies influence at all stages of nursing: from their education to specific practical cases through the prism of theory, data analysis, and methodological development (American Association of Colleges of Nursing, 2021). Competence also implies adherence to ethical standards, which are also critical in building a care plan for aggressive patients. The role of the DNP can be defined as exploratory: the problem still needs effective methods and approaches to ensure nurses' mental safety and clinical interventions in building relationships with the patient.
