neither party and perhaps his social success was due more to his wife's charm than to his own importance. To day the funeral was to take place. By his own desire his body was not being taken to Moorlands the family seat in Gloucestershire but was to be buried at Woking. The family chapel did not appeal to him. Indeed he had never spent much of his time at Moorlands preferring his yacht or the Continent when he was not at Queen's Square. Last night the coffin had been brought downstairs and placed in the large drawing room the scene of many a brilliant function although by day it was a somewhat dreary apartment.
