

Middle English Literature

The Middle English period is the period between the Norman Conquest of England (1066) and the ascension of Henry Tudor (1485). For two centuries after the Norman Conquest, French was the language of the court and Latin that of the Church. Both these languages shaped the grammar, spelling and pronunciation and enriched the vocabulary of English. Also, the amalgamation and the assimilation of the French and the English marked the beginning of a new language and a new literature. Although there were several dialects in use, the dialect used in London and the universities of Oxford and Cambridge – the East Midland dialect – became the dominant dialect of English.

I. Early Middle English literature (literature before Chaucer) can be classified into i) chronicles, ii) religious and didactic poetry and iii) the romances.

i) Chronicles: The main works of this category are the following

a) History of the Kings of Britain was a verse chronicle written in Latin by Geoffrey of Monmouth, a Benedictine monk. In the work he gives an account of many kings who ruled over Britain while his focus is on King Arthur as romantic hero. He gathered together all the stories of King Arthur and presented them as authentic exploits performed by a national hero. The work is now considered to have no value as history but it remains a valuable piece of medieval literature.

b) Brut was a work by Layamon, an English priest in Worcestershire. It contains 30000 lines narrating the history of England including the stories of king Lear and Arthur.

Robert of Gloucester and Robert Mannyng of Brunne were two other important writers of chronicles.

ii) Religious and Didactic Poetry: The following works of religious and didactic poetry deserve mention.
