explores the extent to which discrimination against foreign applicants in the trademark registration process can be used as a behind the border barrier to imports Prima facie evidence shows that in some developing countries the ratio of trademark registrations to applications is much higher for national than for foreign applicants which is consistent with the notion of discrimination against foreign firms A simple model is developed that suggests that incentives to discriminate are stronger when foreign firms manufacture products that are close in quality to the goods produced by domestic firms This hypothesis is then tested and empirically confirmed in three of the four countries in our sample suggesting that discretion and discrimination in the trademark registration process can sometimes be used as a protectionist tool

Trademark Protection, Quality Improvement and Exports in Developing Countries Lei Yang,Xiaopeng Yin,Yin He,2018 Trademarks indicate the inherent quality or other distinguishing features of products Strong trademark protection can lower consumers costs of searching for preferred quality characteristics With weak trademark protection firms in developing countries may not be willing to provide high quality products With strong trademark protection firms have an incentive to maintain or improve quality over time in order not to erode the value of their trademarks By solving the theoretical model we show that strengthened trademark protection in developing countries may induce domestic firms to become exporters and raise the quality of products on the export market The welfare analyses show that strengthened trademark protection in developing countries benefits Southern customers and firms producing high quality products but harms firms producing counterfeits and uninformed customers if firm H charges low prices Given firm H charges a high price the strengthened trademark protection only helps firm H and informed customers in the South while leaves the others unaffected
