

Reducing student reticence through teacher interaction strategy

Winnie Lee and Sarah Ng

Reticence is a common problem faced by ESL/EFL teachers in classrooms, especially in those with mainly Asian students. The willingness to communicate model of MacIntyre, Clement, Dörnyei, and Noels (1998, 'Conceptualizing willingness to communicate in a L2: a situational model of L2 confidence and affiliation'. The Modern Language Journal 82/4: 545–62.) postulates that willingness to speak is determined not only by learners themselves but also by the situation they are in, suggesting that situational variables such as topic and participants should be included in the investigation. This paper aims to examine whether teacher interaction strategy could be one of the factors triggering student reticence in classrooms. A group of Form 1 (Grade 7) Hong Kong Chinese students were given two lessons characterized by different interaction patterns. The two lessons were videotaped for analysis. The results show that teacher strategy is a major determinant of student reticence in classrooms, but it is not the sole factor. Pedagogical factors such as lesson objectives and task type were also found to influence a teacher's classroom-based interaction strategy decision making.

Introduction

How to reduce reticence in ESL/EFL classrooms to increase students' target language use is a pedagogical issue that interests not only language researchers but also teachers. In the past decades, a growing number of studies in ESL/EFL have been conducted to explore the reasons for student reticence in classrooms. The findings have shown that the reasons are very complex and involve multiple learner variables such as motivation, confidence, anxiety, etc. (MacIntyre, Clement, Dörnyei, and Noels 1998; Hashimoto 2002; Yashima 2002; Liu 2005). However, a satisfactory explanation of how these variables interact to produce effects on students' classroom participation behaviour has not yet been achieved. MacIntyre et al. (op.cit.: 545) integrated these variables into a conceptual willingness to communicate (WTC) model, which provides 'a useful interface between these disparate lines of enquiry'.

WTC was originally introduced with reference to L1 communication and was considered to be a fixed personality trait that was stable across situations (McCroskey and Barer 1985 quoted in MacIntyre et al. op.cit.). MacIntyre et al. (ibid.: 546) adapted this model for investigating learners' WTC in a L2, arguing that WTC is a 'situation-based variable' rather than a 'trait-like variable', and students' communicative behaviour in L2 situations is
