Strategic Mobility:

Strategic Mobility Roger D. Baskett, Army War College (U.S.), 1991 Strategic mobility is a phrase often used in today's military jargon. In fact, strategic mobility is an integral part of the military strategy supporting the national security interests of the United States. When most military personnel think of strategic mobility, they usually define the concept in terms of air lift and sealift capability. The Secretary of Defense in his 1990 Joint Military Net Assessment to the U.S. Congress refers to strategic mobility as a strategic lift triad of airlift, sealift, and prepositioning. Certainly, these three aspects of strategic mobility are crucial to a viable force projection capability. This paper focuses on what I believe are the two key concepts that most accurately describe strategic mobility: readiness and sustainability. Two case studies are developed to serve as points of reference in explaining how readiness and sustainability combine to form strategic mobility. The first case study describes how the United Kingdom projected a military force to the South Atlantic in response to the Falkland Islands crisis in 1982. The second case study depicts the United States military deployment to Saudi Arabia following the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in August 1990. Following the case studies, an analysis of strategic mobility is presented.

New Capabilities for Strategic Mobility Analysis: Executive Summary, 1994 Previous research for the Logistics Directorate J4 of the Joint Staff JS found that although the JS J4 uses mobility models in several distinctly different types of analyses, it usually uses only a single specialized type of model, a type that is inappropriate for many of the JS's more important analyses.

Schank, Mattock et al 1991 In general, the typical military mobility analysis includes information about cargoes, the location of what needs to be moved, when it will be available to move, and when it has to be delivered, about the transport network, distances, throughput capacities, roadbed conditions, right-of-way constraints, etc., and about transport assets, the number and type of available vehicles, structures, and equipment, and the schedules and costs under which additional or newer types can be procured. Depending on the problem or operation under consideration, these components are grouped and analyzed three different ways.

How the Army Runs: A Senior Leader Reference Handbook, 2011-2012 U.S. Army War College, 2013-05-20 The U.S. Army War College USAWC is proud to present the 28th Edition of How the Army Runs: A Senior Leader Reference Handbook 2011-2012. Publication of this text at this time, when the Army has been at war for almost a decade, has almost completed restructuring of its operating force and is addressing the structure of the generating force, as well as completing formidable base closure and restationing actions, gives credence to the enduring truth that in order to be successful the Army must sustain and improve itself while it is fully committed to the Nation's bidding. The systems and processes documented and explained in this work are designed to do just that. This text was prepared under the direction of the faculty of the Department of Command Leadership and Management. It is intended to be used in an academic environment during the study of the systems and processes used to develop and sustain trained and ready combat forces to be used by the Combatant Commanders.

Strategic Mobility Thomas K. Sheldon, 1982. This study examines US strategic mobility requirements related to support of a 1 1 2 war scenario. It embraces mobility parameters from out loading origins to intratheater movement at destination. The mobility shortfalls are stated as in order of priority: sealift, airlift, intratheater lift, destination port constraints, and CONUS rail capacity. Recommendations for reducing the shortfalls include creating and following a clear and ambitious plan to re-establish a very strong merchant marine, continuation of present plans for improving C-5 and C-141 inventories, and adding to the Civil Reserve Air Fleet (CRAF), developing and purchasing the C-X aircraft, and prepositioning trucks and Material Handling Equipment (MHE) for contingency use only, constructing and prepositioning floating piers with cranes, and developing a CONUS railroad net structured after the defense highway net.

Kokko, Air University (U.S.), Air War College, 1993. The Need for a Strategic Mobility Strategy for the Objective Force Cedric R. Jasmin, Army War College (U.S.), 2002. The 1995 Mobility Requirements Study Bottoms Up Review (MRS BURU) validated current mobility strategies that emphasized a strategic mobility triad consisting of strategic airlift, sealift, and prepositioned equipment. The Mobility Requirements Study 2005 (MRS 05) further refined mobility requirements. The Army Strategic Responsiveness Quick Look Study 50 is an initial assessment of the Army's capability to meet the vision of deploying a combat brigade anywhere in the world within 96 hours, a combat division within 120 hours and five divisions within 30 days This paper will focus on the current strategic mobility strategy how it was derived and identifies the impact of the Army s Objective Force on Strategic Mobility Strategy I will focus on relevant studies that have formulated our current strategic mobility strategies and look at recent studies that have looked at the deployability of the interim and objective forces The purpose of this study is to examine the differences in mobility requirements for the legacy force and the objective force identify weaknesses in current strategy and make recommendations that support the objective force goals This study concludes with specific recommendations that will synchronize Strategic Mobility Strategies with the deployment of the Interim and Objective Forces The U.S. Strategic Mobility Posture James F. Willie, Army War College (U.S.), 1992 There have been numerous studies of strategic mobility from the 1981 Congressionally Mandated Mobility Study CMMS to those of the subjects of sealift airlift with the case for the C 17 the precipitous decline of the merchant marine and the capability of the Ready Reserve Force RRF More recent studies have addressed future requirements for strategic mobility in the wake of changes in the former Soviet Union and Europe a reduced forward presence and successes in the Gulf War The consensus on strategic mobility is that it continues to be a cornerstone to success This study addresses strategic mobility operations however it does not dwell on past issues that are crucial to strategic mobility but have become axiomatic to the overall mobility debate It assesses strategic mobility capability in light of events that affect mobility planning of the future The first is the 1992 Mobility Requirements Study future mobility requirements are not demand driven but based on scenarios and acceptable risks The next is national security strategy and its focus on regional contingencies and CONUS based forces Finally it addresses the 1993 budget which earmarks 3 billion for sealift to build buy or modify cargo vessels Strategic Mobility Association of the United States Army, 1978 Moving with a Purpose Matthew E. Herzberg, 2023 The expectation is clear Anytime and anywhere United States interests are threatened or an application of national power is desired the United States military can get there in force to achieve strategic effects and fast or so the thinking goes But rapid and persistent strategic mobility is not an American birthright even if reliance on it over the last 35 years has increasingly assumed as much Exemplified by deployment to the Persian Gulf War and catalyzed following the Cold War the capabilities of airlift sealift and pre positioning proved vital elements of U S national power projection across the competition continuum Still focusing on capabilities alone cannot tell the whole story Instead re orienting the understanding of strategic mobility systemically on creating or exploiting access provides the ways for strategic mobility to generate vital strategic effects Unfortunately decision makers lack a framework for properly thinking in this way Throughout history transportation technologies that increased the capacity range and speed of transportation have affected strategic mobility but not through capability alone Instead an interdependent system of strategic mobility exists to create or exploit opportunities for access to enable strategic effects As a decisive decade unfolds and technological capability and the geopolitical context change assumptions about access must be re examined and centered adequately in grand and military strategy formulation and planning with a proper understanding of the strategic mobility system Future technologies will disrupt current assumptions such as reusable rockets that deliver terrestrial cargo anywhere on Earth in minutes and autonomous vehicles that negate risk to human life Therefore now more than ever strategic mobility capabilities must be considered in light of the systemic interactions among capability administration and strategy Access theory is a vital first step to developing a new and necessary theoretical framework to build such understanding Abstract A Review of Strategic Mobility Models and Analysis ,1991 The U S military doctrine adheres to a strategy of forward defense and flexible response One basic premise of the U S global strategy is to defend the nation by fighting our foes on foreign soil To accomplish this objective the United States relies on its strategic mobility system to deploy and sustain military forces worldwide To provide airlift and sealift assets to move large numbers of personnel equipment and support materiel from the continental United States CONUS to foreign locations the U S military either procures and operates such assets or enters into agreements with commercial organizations to provide them Strategic Mobility: A Bridge Or a Gap in Our Military Strategy John K. Henderson,ARMY WAR COLL CARLISLE BARRACKS PA.,1970 The essay discusses the importance of strategic mobility and the problem areas which limit the effectiveness of mobility resources Strategic mobility is a key element in United States military strategy and should be clearly understood by military planners and decision makers Many of the problem areas which affect the degree of mobility available are identified and discussed Modified author abstract
